So I was reading through the recent close queue. I saw an answer that was incredibly rude that didn't appear to offend anyone at all. This is a pretty clear case of flagging what appears to be an argumentative answer without appealing to user's good will to simply let the users opinion go, however I wouldn't want to penalize the user for something that's not clearly misconduct. I assumed that the reputation penalty for closing an answer would not apply to the OP, but should this not be the case? Should there be any penalties for downvoting? A: Only moderators can decide what is "unacceptable behavior" and what isn't. The community can only flag. After a moderator has marked as helpful a moderator flag for your close reason, the post will be deleted. Moderators can also decide to edit your answer (to make it more non-rude, for example) and later delete the answer. Moderators are free to edit any answer. A: That answer is highly unhelpful, it's rude, and on top of that, I think it's wrong. It's going to be downvoted and there is a high likelihood that it will be closed. A moderator would make a best-effort attempt to delete it, but an answer of this type is probably not something that will be improved by more moderation. I would suggest that the poster improve the answer, or delete the answer and start from scratch. That said, it seems as though your flag wasn't handled by a moderator. Mods see a queue of flags in the daily digest. One of the moderators was able to act on this specific flag within the last hour, so it did get seen, just at a later point. A moderator probably decided that the answer was rude and it was closed in error, but did not deal with the flag. Those not in the habit of flagging will often let these things slide. For those that do flag, there is a badge or two for this. The Strunk & White badge is specifically for answering within five minutes of a question being posted, and there is also a Not an Answer option.
